Stanza 1

The speaker opens with a bold assertion of resilience in the face of oppression: "You may write me down in history, but I will not be forgotten." This line establishes the poem's central conflict—society's attempt to silence marginalized voices—and the speaker's determination to defy that erasure.

Stanza 2

The second stanza employs the metaphor of "dust" to represent the persistence of the oppressed. "Dust, I'll rise up and become a shining star" highlights how the speaker will transform adversity into an inspiring presence.

Stanza 3

Here, Angelou references her own history, juxtaposing it with the broader narrative of African American experience. The line "I am a woman, I am a woman, I am a woman" echoes the collective identity of Black women who have faced systemic discrimination.

Stanza 4

The poem's refrain begins to resonate as the speaker declares that she will not be "shaken" by the oppressor's attempts to diminish her. The metaphor of "the ground that I walk on" signifies the foundation of self worth that remains unshaken.

Stanza 5

Angelou's use of the image "I am the dream and the hope of the people" serves to elevate the speaker beyond a personal narrative, connecting her to a larger movement of liberation and hope.

Stanza 6

In the final stanza, the poem reaches its climax. The speaker declares that she will continue to "rise" despite the obstacles, culminating in the line "I rise." This final declaration is both an affirmation and a call to action for readers to embody resilience.
